Low pressure will influence the UK's weather once again this weekend, with a mixture of sunshine and showers for many.

Weekend weather

Met Office Deputy Chief Meteorologist Steven Keates said: "While showers are never too far away through the weekend, there will still be drier spells around and where there are breaks in the cloud on Sunday in the south it should feel quite pleasant.

"Areas to the southeast will see fewer showers with more in the way of bright or sunny spells on Saturday and Sunday, though temperatures are likely to remain around average for the time of year. Areas further north and west will see more frequent showers, some of which will be heavy, and will at times extend south into central areas of England and Wales on Saturday and Sunday."

"Monday, which is a Bank Holiday for those in England, Wales and Northern Ireland, will probably see band of showery rain clear from eastern England early in the day, with sunny spells and scattered showers following on for most places. There are no signals for significant heat in the current forecast period."

Further ahead

An unsettled regime is likely to continue next week with a westerly airflow likely to continue the theme of showers and some longer spells of rain.
